All I know of Margit Hinke is what I find here in this „book.“

Here is a world in which there is only Margit Hinke, a person of unknown age, height, weight, income, social background, disposition, moral character, political or sexual preference.

Thus, it is a world about which I know none of the essential things I know about my world.

It is a world where everything has been reduced to a few questions that become more evocative and troubling with each image and scrap: Who is Margit Hinke? What is it really like to be Margit Hinke? If Margit Hinke could speak, what would she say and how would it sound?

And finally, how would it feel to kiss the central feature of Margit Hinke's world: Margit Hinke's lips.

Such questions echo silently around the giant, expanding room that is the Margit Hinke part of my mind.

Durga is an incarnation of Devi or the Mother GODdess, an unified symbol of all divine forces. This was the GOLDEN age of #women, without whom men and male GODS could not function. Durga was a fierce warrior and fighter, independent and sovereign, a law unto herself, strongly sexual in her reproductive ability, combining in herself the male and the female, the yin and the yang.

Gaunt in gloom, The pale stars their torches, Enshrouded, wave. Ghost-fires from heaven's far verges faint illumine, Arches on soaring arches, Night's sindark nave. Seraphim, The lost hosts awaken To service till

In moonless gloom each lapses muted, dim, Raised when she has and shaken Her thurible. And long and loud, To night's nave upsoaring, A starknell tolls As the bleak incense surges, cloud on cloud, Voidward from the adoring Waste of souls.
